

MARKETING MICE

MEANING OF MARKETING

Marketing is the process of producing, distributing, and selling goods and services. It involves identifying, anticipating, and satisfying customer needs profitably. According to Kotler, it is a social and managerial process of exchanging value, while Robert Lewis emphasizes giving customers what they want, when and where they want it, at a price they can pay. The core principle of marketing is that the customer is the most important, and all efforts should focus on satisfying them.

CUSTOMER CARE

Customer care is vital in MICE marketing, as satisfied attendees are likely to return and bring others. It begins from the moment customers arrive, with all facilities—parking, directions, reception, and event spaces—maintained at the highest standards. Organizers should view the event from the customers' perspective, ensuring everyone, from managers to attendants, contributes to creating a positive experience and exceeding expectations. Without customers, the event has no value.

IMPORTANT FACTORS IN MARKETING

There are several factors in marketing that event organizers must be aware of.

1. Location – environmental factors such as traffic and scenery as well as the attractiveness and accessibility of the location should be considered.
2. Social factors – the attitude of people to what is appropriate might be affected by the attitude of friends and colleagues.
3. Cultural influences – different groups in society with different ethnic origins and social classes will see events in different ways.

IMPORTANT FACTORS IN MARKETING

4. Fashion – during certain historical periods, certain types of events will be popular and will attract many participants.

5. Political factors – local and central government will support events that fit with their beliefs.

6. ECONOMIC factors – assess how much money is available at, corporate and individual level, consider the exchange rates any similar economic factors,

7. Philosophy – the beliefs and attitudes of groups, individuals, and other agencies will affect the range of events that are provided.

MARKETING CONCEPTS

The marketing concepts which are applicable in commerce can also be applied- to events. These are market research, self-analysis, target groups, and marketing mix.

MARKET RESEARCH

Market research involves gathering, recording, and analyzing information about consumers to guide event planning. It reduces the risk of failure and helps develop effective marketing strategies. Research can use secondary sources like libraries, government agencies, associations, and councils, or direct methods such as questionnaires, interviews, and group discussions. Questions must be carefully designed, and data must be accurately analyzed to draw meaningful conclusions for organizing successful events.

SWOT ANALYSIS

The situational analysis can be done by SWOT ,

STRENGTHS – the internal strengths of organization

WEAKNESS – the internal weakness of the organization

OPPORTUNITIES – the external opportunities

THEARTS –the external threats facing the organization

SWOT ANALYSIS

these following are some possibilities that are applicable to events:

Strengths

1. staff ability
2. detailed specialist knowledge
3. local reputation
4. political support
5. enthusiasm and commitment

Weaknesses

1. poor transport facilities
2. limited financial resources
3. lack of general management skills
4. poor public image

SWOT ANALYSIS

these following are some possibilities that are applicable to events:

Opportunities

1. increased public awareness
2. developing partnerships
3. financial returns
4. changing attitudes
5. offering new possibilities

Threats

1. lack of commercial support
2. competition from similar promotions
3. changes in funded priorities
4. economic trends

TARGET GROUPS

Effective market research must identify the target groups relevant to a particular event, including potential participants, spectators, sponsors, and staff. These groups often come from diverse backgrounds and have different needs, requiring tailored marketing strategies to gain their support. Understanding the specific needs of each target group allows event organizers to plan effectively and design strategies that address those needs. This targeted approach is crucial for overall MICE planning and helps in developing a focused and successful marketing strategy, ensuring that all identified groups are properly engaged and satisfied.

MARKETING MIX

The marketing mix is the combination of factors—product, price, place, and promotion—used to achieve the right balance for an enterprise. All four factors must be carefully balanced for every event to ensure success.

PLACE- the various aspect are

1. venue
2. accommodations
3. ancillary facilities
4. sign position
5. maps
6. carpark
7. catering location
8. transportation
9. emergency access
10. host town
11. region
12. country or administrative subdivision
13. environmental conditions
14. geographical location

MARKETING MIX

Product – it is the end result; it may be the tournament, exhibition, seminar, or show. It also includes ancillary contributions such as programs, presentation, quality production, and customer care.

price– the cost of the event which is acceptable to the customer.

promotion– the various aspect are.

1. advertising
2. media relations
3. publicity
4. merchandising
5. pamphlets
6. posters
7. logo
8. displays

MASCOT

The event should have a mascot. A mascot is person, animal, or thing considered to bring good luck a mascot can help promote the event especially with certain target group. The mascot should be identified with the event, should be appropriate and attractive

ADVERTISING

Advertising is essential for the success of an event. Advertising is expensive, but despite its cost, successful advertising is very valuable. Television advertising is expensive, but it is very effective in reaching the mass audience. Effective advertising is necessary to encourage people to attend the event.

MEDIA RELATIONS AND PUBLICITY

Media relations and publicity are crucial and should run alongside advertising for several months before the event. Early publicity helps attract participants and avoid conflicts with other events. While some publicity may require payment, creativity and careful planning can generate substantial exposure at little or no cost.

SUMMARY

Marketing in MICE (Meetings, Incentives, Conventions, and Exhibitions) focuses on meeting customer needs through producing, distributing, and selling services. Key concepts include market research, SWOT analysis, target group analysis, and the marketing mix (product, price, place, promotion, plus people, packaging, partnership, and programming for events). Promotion involves tools like advertising, publicity, logos, souvenirs, and presentations to capture attention, interest, desire, and action. Effective marketing ensures proper customer care and balances all elements to deliver successful events.